Subject: Just Released: "Teacher Absenteeism in Charter and Traditional Public Schools"

DOWNLOAD THE REPORT

Research confirms what common sense dictates: Students learn less when their teachers aren't there. According to multiple studies, a ten-day increase in teacher absence results in at least ten fewer days of learning for students.

Clearly, some absences are unavoidable—teachers are only human. But compared to their counterparts in other industries and other countries, U.S. teachers seem to have poor attendance. On average, they miss about eight school days a year due to sick and personal leave (in addition to the breaks they get for school vacations and national holidays); meanwhile, the average U.S. worker takes about three-and-a-half sick days a year. Yet the first of these averages obscures the degree to which absenteeism is concentrated among a subset of teachers.

In Teacher Absenteeism in Charter and Traditional Public Schools, Fordham senior research and policy associate David Griffith takes an unprecedented look at teacher chronic absenteeism rates in charter and traditional public schools—that is, the percentage of teachers who miss at least eleven days of school, excluding professional development days and field trips.

His major findings include the following:

- Nationally, teachers in traditional public schools are almost three times as likely to be chronically absent as teachers in charter schools: 28.3 percent versus 10.3 percent.
- In eight states plus the District of Columbia, traditional public school teachers are at least four times as likely to be chronically absent as their charter school peers.
= 9
- In thirty-four of the thirty-five states with sizable charter sectors—and in each of the ten largest cities in the country—teachers in traditional public schools are more likely to be chronically absent than teachers in charters.
- The chronic absenteeism gap between charter and traditional public school teachers is largest in states where districts—but not charters—are required to bargain collectively.

Overall, these results suggest that the high chronic absenteeism rates we observe for teachers in traditional public schools are at least partly attributable to the generous leave policies enshrined in state laws and local collective bargaining agreements—and that the chronic absenteeism rate in many places could be reduced without exploiting teachers.

= A

Consequently, as policymakers across the country move to tackle student chronic absenteeism through their ESSA accountability plans, we must ask: Why would we hold schools accountable for the attendance of their students but not of their own teachers? How can anyone expect students to learn when their teachers are absent?

The infographic features a large graphic of a calendar for September. The days of the month are represented by circles, with approximately 11 circles shaded black to indicate absences. Below the calendar, a white stick figure is shown sitting at a desk, looking at a computer screen. The screen displays a large amount of illegible text. To the right of the calendar, text defines chronic absence and compares rates between traditional public schools and charter schools.

Teachers who miss AT LEAST 11 DAYS of school for sick or personal leave are considered "chronically absent."

Nationally, teachers in traditional public schools are almost THREE TIMES AS LIKELY to be chronically absent as teachers in charter schools.

In states where districts—but not charters—are required to bargain collectively, teachers in the former are THREE TIMES AS LIKELY to be chronically absent.

Similarly, teachers in unionized charter schools are TWICE AS LIKELY to be chronically absent as those in non-unionized charters.

OHIO SUBMITS ESSA PLAN – The Ohio Department of Education (ODE) has officially submitted the state's federal Every Student Succeeds Act (ESSA) plan to the U.S. Department of Education for review. The plan was approved by the State Board of Education and Governor Kasich, while also reflecting feedback gathered from legislators, educators, business and community leaders, parents and students. Ohio was one of 30 states to submit its plan this month and the approval process is expected to take several months. Ohio's plan addresses four key areas: 1) academic content standards and assessments; 2) accountability; 3) school improvement; and 4) educator effectiveness. While the state waits on plan approval, the Ohio Department of Education will begin working with districts and schools to implement ESSA this school year.

A Lot Has Changed in Education in the Past Few Decades – Columbus Dispatch

- As The Dispatch looks ahead to where K-12 public education will be in 20 years, there's a complicated story behind how we got where we are today. The local education landscape has been dismantled and reassembled multiple times at the hands of the courts, federal and state lawmakers; the explosion of new technology; and the choices of families themselves

Students Go from Conformity to Individuality with One-on-One Learning – Columbus Dispatch

- In an age when people can order any of millions of items online, and when nearly every song is available for listening, why shouldn't education meet people right where they are, too? It is starting in some schools: Children following a curriculum, but at different speeds and in different ways

Kids Draw the Darndest Future Schools – Columbus Dispatch

- Robot teachers, flying cars and lots of underwater schools. Oh, and instruction on how to make friends with a bear. Those, according to Columbus elementary students, highlight the state of education in the year 2037. The students drew what this will look like

What's Unique to Humans? That Will Predict Education, Jobs – Columbus Dispatch

- And that's where our concept of school might have to evolve. It could lead to a real existential debate. If machines can do most everything that people used to do, what are we left with? Why are we here? The answer isn't that every child in America needs to learn to write computer code, she said, though there's nothing wrong with learning to code

More Schools Link Programs with Specific Job Requirements – Columbus Dispatch

- Because they're smaller and more nimble, community colleges can move fast to tailor programs to in-demand fields and even specific companies. Subject: ICYMI: "Teacher Absenteeism in Charter and Traditional Public Schools"

READ THE REPORT

Last week, we released Teacher Absenteeism in Charter and Traditional Public Schools, in which Fordham senior research and policy associate David Griffith took an unprecedented look at teacher chronic absenteeism rates—that is, the percentage of teachers who miss at least eleven days of school.

His major findings included the following:

- Nationally, teachers in traditional public schools are almost three times as likely to be chronically absent as teachers in charter schools: 28.3 percent versus 10.3 percent.

- In eight states plus the District of Columbia, traditional public school teachers are at least four times as likely to be chronically absent as their charter school peers.
- In thirty-four of the thirty-five states with sizable charter sectors—and in each of the ten largest cities in the country—teachers in traditional public schools are more likely to be chronically absent than teachers in charters.
- The chronic absenteeism gap between charter and traditional public school teachers is largest in states where districts—but not charters—are required to bargain collectively.

Here's what people are saying about "Teacher Absenteeism in Charter and Traditional Public Schools:"

EDUCATION WEEK

"The Washington-based Thomas B. Fordham Institute found that the gaps between charter and district teachers were largest in the states where the districts have to collectively bargain—or negotiate conditions of employment, including time off—but charters do not have to do so."

= A

THE SEVENTY FOUR

"The Fordham analysis suggests that in schools like higher-achieving charters, which have closely prescribed behavioral codes, deep commitment to the school's philosophy, and no tenure protection, teachers will be less likely to miss school."

"The Fordham Institute's recent study, Teacher Absenteeism in Charter and Traditional Public Schools, reminds us of what a critical role teachers play in the success of their classrooms. ↗ 0

NATIONAL REVIEW

"When nearly one-fourth of teachers are missing another two weeks of school a year on top of all that, it's a problem. But it's an even bigger problem that those who speak for the profession respond to the news as the children they teach might do ? 4 with anger at being busted — rather than like responsible adults. It will be hard for teachers to earn the esteem they seek until those who claim to speak for the profession start to grow up."

"Although Fordham acknowledges that there is no clear relationship between collective bargaining laws and chronic teacher absenteeism in traditional public schools, it says the gap between charter and district teachers is smallest in states such as Georgia and Texas where collective bargaining is illegal."

"Nearly one-third of teachers in Ohio's traditional public schools are chronically absent, but the rate in charter schools is significantly less. That's according to a report released this week by the right-leaning Thomas B. Fordham Institute, a Washington, D.C.-based think tank that operates more than a dozen charter schools in the state."

90.5
WESA

"[Fordham] also notes that many states, including Pennsylvania, are adding "chronic student absenteeism" to their list of school quality indicators as part of their plans to comply with the new federal education law. Fordham suggests tracking chronic teacher absenteeism as well."

THE WASHINGTON FREE BEACON

"Public school teachers are three times more likely to miss large chunks of school days than their peers at charter schools, which could hurt student learning, according to a new report."

CONCORD MONITOR

"But the Fordham researchers also added that variation in absenteeism across schools within the same district suggested other factors, like culture and working conditions, likely play a role. A "no excuses" culture might contribute to fewer absences, they wrote – as might policies that improve working conditions, like on-site day care."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution

"A new report by the Thomas B. Fordham Institute looks at the number of teachers who miss 11 or more days of work a year and compares the absentee rates in charter schools and regular public schools. The study finds teachers in charters are less likely to miss school."

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

Supreme Court Takes Up Janus v. AFSCME The Buckeye Institute's Amicus Brief Called for Protection of 1st Amendment

Columbus, OH - This morning, the United States Supreme Court agreed to hear Janus v. AFSCME, which The Buckeye Institute asked the court to take up in its amicus brief, supporting Mark Janus and the First Amendment. In its brief, filed on July 7, 2017, Buckeye showed that unions can survive without compelled contributions and, alternatively, that this change will lead unions to better serve their members.

"We are pleased that the Supreme Court will take up this crucial case to protect the First Amendment rights of public employees," said Robert Alt, president and CEO of The Buckeye Institute. "Forcing employees to pay for speech with which they disagree and forcing them to pay fees to a union in order to keep their jobs is unjust and unconstitutional. We are confident that Mr. Janus will prevail and that the court will rule in favor of the First Amendment rights of all public employees."

Illinois, among other states, forces public sector employees who opt out of their union to pay an agency fee, which is supposed to support the union for collective bargaining services, including lobbying on behalf of the union. As a result, Mr. Janus, a child support specialist with the Illinois Department of Healthcare and Family Services, is forced to pay fees to the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME), a government union, in order to keep his job.

Highlighting how union compelled fees undermine the First Amendment, Mr. Janus said in a January 2016 op-ed in the Chicago Tribune:

"I went into this line of work because I care about kids. But just because I care about kids doesn't mean I also want to support a government union. Unfortunately, I have no choice. To keep my job at the state, I have to pay monthly fees to the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, or AFSCME, a public employee union that claims to 'represent' me..."

"The union voice is not my voice. The union's fight is not my fight. But a piece of my paycheck every week still goes to the union. I am not anti-union. Unions have their place. And some people like them. But unions aren't a fit for everyone. And I shouldn't be forced to pay money to a union if I don't think it does a good job representing my interests."

Supreme Court Takes Up Janus v. AFSCME The Buckeye Institute's Amicus Brief Called for Protection of 1st Amendment

Columbus, OH - This morning, the United States Supreme Court agreed to hear Janus v. AFSCME, which The Buckeye Institute asked the court to take up in its amicus brief, supporting Mark Janus and the First Amendment. In its brief, filed on July 7, 2017, Buckeye showed that unions can survive without compelled contributions and, alternatively, that this change will lead unions to better serve their members.

"We are pleased that the Supreme Court will take up this crucial case to protect the First Amendment rights of public employees," said Robert Alt, president and CEO of The Buckeye Institute. "Forcing employees to pay for speech with which they disagree and forcing them to pay fees to a union in order to keep their jobs is unjust and unconstitutional. We are confident that Mr. Janus will prevail and that the court will rule in favor of the First Amendment rights of all public employees."

Illinois, among other states, forces public sector employees who opt out of their union to pay an agency fee, which is supposed to support the union for collective bargaining services, including lobbying on behalf of the union. As a result, Mr. Janus, a child support specialist with the Illinois Department of Healthcare and Family Services, is forced to pay fees to the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME), a government union, in order to keep his job.

Highlighting how union compelled fees undermine the First Amendment, Mr. Janus said in a January 2016 op-ed in the Chicago Tribune:

"I went into this line of work because I care about kids. But just because I care about kids doesn't mean I also want to support a government union. Unfortunately, I have no choice. To keep my job at the state, I have to pay monthly fees to the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, or AFSCME, a public employee union that claims to 'represent' me..."

And some people like them. But unions aren't a fit for everyone. And I shouldn't be forced to pay money to a union if I don't think it does a good job representing my interests."

Supreme Court Takes Up Janus v. AFSCME The Buckeye Institute's Amicus Brief Called for Protection of 1st Amendment

Columbus, OH - This morning, the United States Supreme Court agreed to hear Janus v. AFSCME, which The Buckeye Institute asked the court to take up in its amicus brief, supporting Mark Janus and the First Amendment. In its brief, filed on July 7, 2017, Buckeye showed that unions can survive without compelled contributions and, alternatively, that this change will lead unions to better serve their members.

"We are pleased that the Supreme Court will take up this crucial case to protect the First Amendment rights of public employees," said Robert Alt, president and CEO of The Buckeye Institute. "Forcing employees to pay for speech with which they disagree and forcing them to pay fees to a union in order to keep their jobs is unjust and unconstitutional. We are confident that Mr. Janus will prevail and that the court will rule in favor of the First Amendment rights of all public employees."

Illinois, among other states, forces public sector employees who opt out of their union to pay an agency fee, which is supposed to support the union for collective bargaining services, including lobbying on behalf of the union. As a result, Mr. Janus, a child support specialist with the Illinois Department of Healthcare and Family Services, is forced to pay fees to the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME), a government union, in order to keep his job.

Highlighting how union compelled fees undermine the First Amendment, Mr. Janus said in a January 2016 op-ed in the Chicago Tribune:

"I went into this line of work because I care about kids. But just because I care about kids doesn't mean I also want to support a government union. Unfortunately, I have no choice. To keep my job at the state, I have to pay monthly fees to the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, or AFSCME, a public employee union that claims to 'represent' me..."

"The union voice is not my voice. The union's fight is not my fight. But a piece of my paycheck every week still goes to the union. I am not anti-union. Unions have their place. And some people like them. But unions aren't a fit for everyone. And I shouldn't be forced to pay money to a union if I don't think it does a good job representing my interests."
